The world looks different in 2020, and Home Runs for Horton's Kids will, too! Event admission will include batting and fielding practice with National’s staff, a fast pitch competition in the bullpen, and grab-and-go stadium fare snacks with open bar. You can find more event details, including health and safety regulations, on page 3.

We greatly appreciate your generosity during these challenging times. All event proceeds will go to empowering children and their families living in one of DC’s most under-resourced neighborhoods that has been adversely impacted by COVID-19.

Horton's Kids empowers children growing up in one of DC’s most under-resourced communities so that they graduate from high school ready for success in college, career, and life. We serve 500 children in grades K-12 living in Wellington Park, a neighborhood where 80 percent of adults don’t have a high school diploma and the average annual household income is less than $10,000. Your impact is dramatic: children in Horton’s Kids are twice as likely to graduate from high school.

Lawmakers join Nats Park fundraiser for DC kids charity
July 10, 2019

Lawmakers on Wednesday night pitched in at a baseball-themed fundraiser at Nationals Park, helping to raise money for Washington, D.C., children.

How long is 4 miles in the shadow of the Capitol?
July 13, 2019

Horton’s Kids brings Congress east of the river, but gap still remains

Nathan Woods, who still hears the gunshots outside his D.C. home in the early ’90s. He grew up in Wellington Park, a neighborhood less than four miles from the lobbying and lawmaking of Capitol Hill.

When he was a sophomore at Woodberry Forest High School, an all-boys boarding school down in Virginia, he got the call: His oldest brother, Brice, had been shot in the head. By the time he got to the hospital, his brother was dead.

But Brice, or “Bricky” as his family called him, left behind a plan. He was the one who signed his siblings up for Horton’s Kids, an organization focused on serving Ward 8, where they lived with their single mom.

“We got on the bus... and we headed to a local library around the corner,” a now 27-year-old Woods tells me over the phone as he fights his way through morning traffic in the District. Before long he was visiting the Capitol building, which felt much further away than it was.

The group’s connection to Congress dates back to 1999, when founder Karin Walker was working as a staffer for Democratic Rep. Joe Macknelly. One night as she stopped for gas in Southeast D.C., a group of kids who lived in the nearby homeless shelter approached her. They wanted to pump her gas for some money, but it turns out Walker offered to take them to the zoo the following weekend. That trip marked the beginning of Horton’s Kids now in its 20th year.

The early days were “very scrappy,” recalls Dan Walla, who chairs the group’s board of directors. “Evetything that got done was done in somebody’s spare time.”

Walla worked for Republican Rep. Virginia Foxx when he first got involved with Horton’s Kids in 1997. It remembers the times that startled congressional staffers from Capitol South to Metro to Wellington Park so they could hang out with kids for training.

Members of Congress from both sides of the aisle, from Nancy Pelosi to Jim Clyburn, have volunteered. So has Luke Tapper, who was a press secretary on the Hill at the time.###
